| | All working people, employees and employers alike, are members of their families. They play the roles of children, parents as well as brothers and sisters. Besides work, they have family commitments to attend to, particularly looking after children and elderly parents. |
| | Employees are important assets of a company. All successful businesses adopt an employee-oriented management philosophy. |
| | Nowadays, more and more employers are becoming aware that business success does not depend entirely on operation efficiency. It is equally important to look after employees' family needs and help them balance work and family so that they can carry out duties without any worries. |
| | What can employers do to help staff balance their work and family life? |

| | You know what? He's been working extra hard these days. |
| | E: You've got a point there. We in the restaurant business can't afford to have staff being preoccupied with family matters. They may somehow offend customers or injure themselves. It's costly in either case. |
| | D : All I'm offering is a little flexibility. It helps him and my |
| | business at no additional cost. Feeling valued and being cared of, my other staff will put in extra effort in their work as well. |
| | E: Sounds like a really nice idea. I wonder if it'll work in my shop? (thinking) |

| The major premise of our flexible working hours arrangement is that |
| normal operation of the company will not be affected. That's why |
| we've set the core working hours of 9:00am to 5:30pm during which |
| all employees, except those on leave or in meeting elsewhere, are |
| required to be on duty. Colleagues have been in better spirit since |
| this measure has been introduced. We appreciate that employees are |
| important assets of the company. If they're happy, they'll project |
| that positive sentiment to our clients and in turn benefit the |
| company. And the cost is very low as well. I think this measure can |
| create a win-win situation. |
